JW Marriott Austin. I'm starting to realise this might have to be my tactic for the rest of the month: get as much writing done around work as I can during the week, and then go all-out on the weekends to catch up.

This year I decided to write first before everyone got up. Or partner with a writer. They want the most valuable currencies we have: our attention and our time. It was easier to keep track of plot and I was able to delve deeper into my characters because I was spending time with them daily. I put on 10 pounds that month, but I wrote the story—all the way through to that ever-elusive ending.

And a lot of it is good. This could leave your story feeling end-heavy. I pattered about with my life, getting a job, a cat, a house and a husband. These are essential baseline thoughts every writer will benefit by knowing, even if used sparingly while any writer can lean on the encouragement.
