Without panel data, we cannot establish the precise impact that changes over the past 25 years in subjective social status might have had on the propensity of various groups to support candidates and causes on the populist right. Google Scholar. That is why I did not vote. The Local. One of the readings of this result is that socially-conservative independentists have won the competition within the pro-independence block, which is of course very bad news for the left in general. We use linear probability models rather than logistic regression to accommodate fixed effects, although logistic regressions yield similar results.

This schism was interpreted as an offshoot of "neocon" [33] or "social conservative". We are comparing people who voted for the populist right to people who voted for other parties, these estimations do not include people who did not vote or expressed no party preference.
